Dendritic cells are important cells of the immune system. DCs present antigen peptides to T cells in association with major histocompatibility complex (MHC) class I or II molecules. When activated, DCs can migrate to regional lymph nodes and the spleen. This migration enables DCs to activate naive T cells. T cells that become activated by DCs in regional lymph nodes travel to the spleen and become localized in the marginal zone. There, DC-activated T cells can either be eliminated by apoptosis or enter into a process called anergy. There is evidence that DCs play an important role in immunity against tumors. Tumor-specific T cells are activated in regional lymph nodes by DCs that have acquired tumor antigen from cancer cells. Subsequent penetration of the draining lymph nodes and induction of cytotoxic T lymphocytes (CTLs) are required for tumor eradication. Consequently, it is desirable to have tumor antigens, antigen-presenting cells, and vaccine adjuvants that enhance CTL-mediated cancer therapy. Diabetes has long been recognized as a disease characterized by immune-mediated destruction of the islet cells of the pancreas. The management of insulin-dependent diabetes has developed from the random use of metformin in the 1950's (Hemkens et al., 1956) to the recent introduction of insulin analogs, which provide better glucose control with fewer hypoglycemic episodes than human insulin (Wyeth et al., 2005). Although the mechanisms by which insulin acts are incompletely understood, the idea that insulin treatment influences immune mechanisms has been known for decades (reviewed in Devos et al., 2004). A landmark study was published in 1993 (Davy et al., 1993), in which it was found that long-term insulin treatment in nonobese diabetic (NOD) mice delayed the onset of diabetes and decreased islet cell destruction, and it was attributed to the use of a modified A/J mouse strain that was not fully susceptible to spontaneous diabetes. It is now known that the A/J mouse is a relatively weak inducer of insulinitis in the presence of nonadherent, lymphopenic, immunologically naive hosts. This property of A/J mice can be explained in terms of the reduced islet infiltration by diabetogenic T cells observed
