Reince Priebus, Donald Trump's controversial incoming chief of staff, caused a firestorm of protest when he said on NBC's Meet the Press program that the Obama administration has been "deporting people at a record rate." The fact is, this number is just the continuation of an ordinary practice that has been around for decades — but is currently on an extraordinary scale. In the past three years of the Obama presidency alone, the United States has picked up more than 2,000 undocumented immigrants from its southern border with Mexico. "It's a problem of our system — not one of our policies," said David Leopold, who is involved in immigration litigation as a lawyer at the American Civil Liberties Union. "The Immigration and Naturalization Service [used to be a part of the Department of Justice], and it's now Homeland Security. There's a consensus that's gone in recent years that the border is so porous, that in fact, it is illegal immigration, that agents should focus on it." Indeed, for years the U.S. government had no real idea of how many undocumented immigrants were in the country. And if, as an administration official said recently, all immigration law enforcement officers really do want to go after violent criminals, that wouldn't seem to be an effective use of government resources. "People come to the country illegally to avoid the attention of the immigration service and the authorities," said Leopold. "It's so hard for the government to really know what's going on. They are not a very good statistician. They do not do surveys asking people if they are illegal, they don't ask that in immigration court." Places of Detention Immigrants are not always prosecuted. And for those who are, they can end up being sent to places of detention. In 2013 alone, immigrants were detained at nearly twice as many places as last year, according to an Amnesty International report. In all, the report found, there were 18 facilities for immigrant women and children,
