"Live Without Fear" Rhea Kelly has preached the power of living without fear for decades. Now she wants to take her message to a wider audience, beginning with the Liberty Legal Foundation, the new nonprofit foundation she and Roy Moore started to further promote the conservative causes they believe in. Moore, who officially launched the Foundation in July, said he founded it to stand up to the Washington establishment. Kellie is Moore's second wife and has never worked in the political arena. After marrying Moore, she retired from her day job at a factory to pursue her passion, and said she isn't bothered by the attention that comes with being married to Moore, a former state Supreme Court chief justice. "My husband can do what he wants to do," Kelly said. "Why should he be hurt?" Like many of Moore's other projects, the non-profit foundation is giving former state court Judge to the public service. Their first move is to file a lawsuit against an environmental agency that won't use its authority to regulate radioactive waste and energy. "We had to come to these hearings in an emergency," Moore said, "This is a public agency going against us on a matter of public safety." The foundation hopes to place a similar emergency order against a university that didn't recognize when its Master's degrees expire. They claim the school is overstepping its boundaries. "This is our right," Moore said. "We believe it is an emergency situation." The foundation says they will also focus on a human rights issue that affects women and children. "We will stand for these people that need help," Moore said. The foundation will also address the perceived wrongs of an 1876 state
